Introduction

What happens if you place an online sales page in front of a targeted audience?

You'll make a few sales if your offer and sales copy are both good. But it's also likely that up to 98% or even 99% of your prospects will leave the sales page without hitting your "buy now" button.

That's pretty dismal, isn't it? But the good news is you can improve your conversion rate. And one excellent way to do that is by creating your own Client Bridge or free pre-sales report.

As the name implies, this is a report that you give away to your prospects as means of warming them up to the idea of buying your product or service. It tends to work well for two reasons...

- 1: Your prospects drop their defences. Because you're giving your prospects a valuable report and not a sales letter, they tend to drop their "advertising" defences. That means they'll read your report with an open mind. And by the time they get to the end, they'll be open to your suggestions.
- 2: Your report demonstrates value. This is a benefit no matter what kind of product you're selling. But it's especially important when you're selling information products. That's because anyone who is impressed with the information you're giving away for FREE is going to assume that your paid information is even better.

As you can see, presell reports are powerful tools.

So now it's time you learned how to harness this power for yourself. And that's exactly what you'll learn how to do inside this exciting report. You're about to learn:

- ✓ What kind of presell report works best. Hint: it depends on what you sell.
- ✓ How to write your report. You'll learn five different angles to use that impress prospects and warm them up to the idea of buying your product or service.
- ✓ How to create a call to action that gets your prospects clicking through to your order page.

Let's get started...

Pick Your Approach

First things first: you need to decide what you're going to promote in your report. This could be your own offer. It could be an affiliate offer. It doesn't matter one way or another, because a presell report works for just about any type of product or service.

You'll also need to consider whether you're selling a physical product, a service or an information product, as this will affect how you write your report.

Let me explain...

Selling an information product? Here you can offer a report that is "useful yet incomplete." This means that your presell report teaches something valuable to your prospects. And yet it doesn't completely solve their problems, so your prospects need to buy your information product to get the rest of their solution.

Selling a physical product? A presell report for a physical product is useful, because the information can just about fully solve your prospect's problem. But the thing is, in order for your prospect to completely solve their problem, they need to buy the product you're promoting.

Example: Let's suppose you're selling dog kennels. You can provide complete and full instructions to your prospects to teach them how to housetrain their puppies. The only thing that your prospect won't have is the kennel, which you'll promote from within your report.

Selling a service? Many people sell services by putting out reports that teach others how to do the service.

Example: A copywriter might put out a report about how to write a sales letter. The hope of the author is that the reader will realise it's a difficult task and end up just hiring the copywriter instead.

Sometimes this works. However, the problem with this sort of report is that it's aimed at a different target market.

Let's go back to the copywriting example.

Here we have two target markets:

- People who want to do it themselves. These are the people who're reading a "how to" report. Unfortunately, they're not interested in hiring a freelance copywriter.
- People who want to hire a copywriter. These are the people who're the prime target market for the copywriter... and yet these people are NOT reading "how to" reports, simply because they fully intend to hire a freelancer.

See the problem? The report doesn't attract a targeted audience.

As such, if you're selling a service then you need to make sure that you're writing something of interest to your most targeted audience.

Example: In the case of the freelance copywriter, he might write a report called, "How to Find and Hire a High-Response Copywriter." That way, his readers will be part of his target market.

So, do you see the difference between these three approaches?

Let me quickly recap:

- If you're selling an information product, then your goal is to leave your prospects happy with what you've provided them, but eager to learn more.
- If you're selling physical products, the goal of your presell report is to offer valuable information, so that your prospects have everything they need to solve their problem... except whatever product it is that you're promoting.
- If you're selling a service, then you just need to be sure that your report is of interest to your target market. This can be as simple as teaching your prospects how to recognize good service providers (like you!).

You'll learn exactly how to use these approaches in the next section of this report. But first, there's one last thing you need to know before you start to write your report

You need to keep your eye on the goal.

Meaning that you need to focus on promoting just ONE primary offer in your report.

If you promote more than one offer, you're going to confuse your readers. If they have too many choices, they may not bother clicking on your links at all.

Secondly, if you promote just one product in your report, then you'll write your report with this one product in mind. You'll create the report with primary purpose of preselling this product. And thus your report will be much more effective due to its single-minded purpose.

So, pick on just one product and write your entire report with the sole goal of pre-selling that one product.

Which brings us neatly on to our next topic...

Writing Your Report

As you just discovered, what you're selling is going to influence how you write your report. What you learned above is the "big picture," the overall approach to your report. Now it's time to get down to the details.

Read on to discover five specific approaches to writing your report, impressing your prospects and preselling them on your signature products and services...

Approach 1: Provide an Overview of a Process

This is one of the "useful yet incomplete" approaches, which makes it a good choice if you're selling information products.

Basically, the idea is that you give your prospects a good overview of a process.

The key, however, is that while you tell what to do, you don't tell them how to complete each step. You then point them towards an information product that will fill in the details and solve their problems.

Example: Let's suppose that you're selling a book about how to set up a blog. You can then create a presell report that gives your prospects an overview of the process. Thus you'll lay out all the steps:

Step 1: Get a domain name.

Step 2: Set up web hosting.

Step 3: Install a WordPress blog.

Step 4: Customize the WordPress blog.

Step 5: Start blogging.

Step 6: Monetize the blog.

Step 7: Drive targeted traffic to the blog.

Within each step you'll provide some information.

Example: At Step 7 you might list several ways to get traffic, such as “taking advantage of joint venture opportunities” or “social media marketing”. But just like the rest of the report, these sub-steps provide an overview of what to do, without telling readers exactly how to complete the step.

The point being, your reader is going to have questions at every step.

Here are some examples of the questions your reader might have:

Step 1: Get a domain name. Should I get a dot com name or does it matter? Where should I buy this domain name?

Step 2: Set up web hosting. What features should I look for in a webhost? How do I transfer my domain name servers?

Step 3: Install a WordPress blog. Can I do this even if I'm not very technical? Where can I hire someone to do this for me?

Step 4: Customize the WordPress blog. How do I tweak a blog theme? Where can I get a custom theme?

Step 5: Start blogging. What should I write about? Where can I get blog ideas? How long should my posts be? How often should I blog?

Step 6: Monetize the blog. How do I pick a product to promote? Or how do I decide on a monetization model? What are my options?

Step 7: Drive targeted traffic to the blog. What's the best way to get traffic? How can I optimize my posts for the search engines? What are the best free methods?

Now, when it comes to smaller topics – like picking a domain name – your report can certainly answer all your readers' questions.

Example: You can tell them to get a short, memorable dot com domain name through NameCheap.com.

However, when it comes to the “big” (important) topics, like how to write good blog posts, how to monetize the blog and how to get traffic to the blog, you're going to be offering more of an overview than anything.

You can offer useful tips – maybe enough to get a beginner blogger up and running – but any serious blogger will need to buy your product in order to build a successful, profitable blog.

And that's exactly why this style of presell report works so well. You get an opportunity to demonstrate your knowledge by sharing an overview of the process along with useful tips. Your prospect gets enough information to get started. And yet the serious prospect will hit the "buy" button to get the full details.

Let me offer you two other examples from different niches:

Example #1: You're selling a book about organic pest control. You give your readers an overview of the options, such as companion planting, pest traps and using homemade organic sprays. Your readers will need to order your book in order to get the full solutions, steps and spray recipes.

Example #2: You're selling a dieting book. You might offer an overview of how to cut calories from the diet, eat closer to nature and start exercising. The book you're promoting will provide all the necessary details, such as exactly how many calories the dieter should eat, what to eat (recipes included) and how often to exercise.

That's one approach. Here's another...

Approach 2: Give Complete Details on Part of a Process

Here's another way to offer something "useful yet incomplete" for your prospects. The idea here is to offer full and complete details, leaving nothing out... but only for PART of the overall process.

Example: Returning to the blogging example with these seven steps:

Step 1: Get a domain name.

Step 2: Set up web hosting.

Step 3: Install a WordPress blog.

Step 4: Customize the WordPress blog.

Step 5: Start blogging.

Step 6: Monetize the blog.

Step 7: Drive targeted traffic to the blog.

You can offer complete, step-by-step instructions and details for Steps 1-4. Your report can even include screenshots for those who aren't very technically minded. If your readers follow your instructions, they'll take action and have their blog up and running before the day is through.

Once their blog is up, then they want to start posting content, monetize their blog and drive traffic. In order to skip the learning curve and start making money sooner, they'll need to buy your blogging product in order to discover how to do steps 5-7.

See how that works?

Let me give you two more examples across a couple of different niches:

Example #1: You're selling a dog obedience book. Your presell report gives complete instructions on how to teach a dog to sit, stay and lie down. The reader will need to buy your paid product in order to discover how to housetrain a puppy, teach a dog to heel, or to break the dog of bad habits like jumping on the counter.

Example #2: You're selling a gardening book. Your presell report gives complete instructions for designing a garden and planting the seeds. Readers need to buy your paid product in order to learn about pest control, disease prevention and maintenance issues.

Now here's something I want you to keep in mind...

Your presell report can offer steps that are already listed in your paid report.

Example: Maybe your blogging book tells people how to set up their website. In that case, it's okay if your presell report shares this same information.

Indeed, you can even advertise your presell report as a free excerpt of your paid report. That means you don't even have to do much work to create your presell report. Just copy and paste the excerpt, and then create a call to action at the end of the report (which you'll learn how to do just a bit later). Simple, yet very effective.

That's one approach to this particular style of presell report. The second approach is to offer information that is NOT found in your paid product. Typically, this is background information that beginners need to know before they can fully utilize your paid product.

Example: Once again let's return to the blogging example. Except this time, let's assume that your paid product is 100% focused on the final three blog topics: how to write blog posts, how to monetize the blog and driving traffic. In this case, your readers need to know how to set up their own blog in order to make full use of your product. Thus you can use your presell report to deliver this pre-requisite information. It gives you a chance to showcase your expertise while providing some very valuable information to your reader.

Naturally, this style of report also works well to sell a physical product. That's because you can offer full information on part (or even all) of the process, with a recommendation to buy a product embedded within the information.

Let me give you a couple more examples:

Example #1: You create a presell report that teaches people how to cook great steaks. Part of what creates such great steaks is the "secret seasoning" – which of course you sell on your website.

Example #2: You create a presell report that teaches bodybuilders how to eat to get big. You sell whey protein, which of course your report emphasizes as one of the keys to growing muscles.

Now let's take a look at the next approach...

Approach 3: Offer Valuable Tips

This approach works well whether you're selling information products, physical products or services. And just as the name implies, your presell report offers valuable tips to your readers about how to solve their problems.

There are two different approaches you can take:

1. Offer multiple short tips. Here you might write a report that's stocked full of dozens of tips. However, each tip is just a sentence or two long.

Example: If you were writing a report sharing dieting tips, you might have tips such as, "Skip the salad dressing and use olive oil instead," or "Cut out the soda and replace those sugary drinks with water."

2. Offer fewer tips, but with more explanation. In this case, your tips report might only include five to ten tips. However, you offer more explanation as well as examples.

Example: Let's say you have a tip like, "Replace unhealthy fats with healthier fats." You can then go on to explain the difference between saturated and unsaturated fats, and how the "bad" fats can wreak havoc with cholesterol levels and heart health. Finally, you'd share with your readers examples of both good fats (salmon oil) as well as bad fats (chicken skin).

Now let me share with you three examples of presell tips reports you might create to sell services, sell an information product or sell a physical product:

Example #1: You're selling freelance writing services. You can create a report called, "7 Ways to Save Money on Freelance Writing Services."

Example #2: You're selling a book about productivity. You could create a presell report called "17 Secrets for Getting More Done in Less Time."

Example #3: You're selling dog grooming clippers. You could create a presell report called, "10 Tips for Making Your Poodle Look Magnificent."

Now, because this is a tips report, it's inherently a "useful yet incomplete" report. The tips are useful, yes. They help your prospects solve at least part of their problem, yes. But if you're selling an information product, your readers will need to buy your paid product in order to fully solve their problems.

Now let's look at an entirely different approach...

Approach 4: Use the Controversial Approach

So far, we've been talking about reports that focus on offering high-quality, valuable tips and "how to" information to your readers. As mentioned before, the idea is to impress your readers. Because if they're impressed by the quality of your free information, they're more likely to take their credit card out and buy your paid products.

This is a proven way to create a pre-sell report. But another way to do it is by stirring up some controversy. That is, your report can still offer valuable information. But the emphasis on your report is on the controversy.

Why? Because stirring up controversy and heated debate in your niche will get more people downloading and reading your report. In other words, you can use controversy to make your report go viral.

Let me give you an example. Which of the following reports do you suppose is more likely to catch fire in the weight loss niche and go viral?

Example #1: 10 Tips for Losing 10 Pounds

Example #2: Warning: The Weight Loss Industry Wants You to be FAT Forever!

That's right, the second report is much more likely to go viral. Not only is the title itself controversial, curiosity-evoking and eyebrow-raising, but you can also follow this controversial style through within the actual report.

Example: The person who writes this controversial report might set up an “us versus them” argument. The author might suggest that the dieting industry – from those selling weight loss books to those who’re personal trainers – want people to stay fat. Because as long as you stay fat, these greedy marketers get to keep selling you diets, recipe books and supplements that don’t work.

It’s controversial, right?

And yet many people who try to lose weight tend to do “yo-yo dieting.” That means that they gain the weight back. That means that they find it even harder to take the weight off again. So these people may see how it’s plausible that the dieting industry wants to keep them fat. And this little theory seems even more plausible once readers consider the rubbish that certain marketers are peddling, like certain diet pills and outlandish, even dangerous diets.

In this example, the marketer might spend about half of the report building a “case” against the dieting industry. In doing so, the marketer is stirring up emotion and getting people motivated to find a better solution. The marketer can then use the second half of the report to lay out an overview of a solution – that is, a diet that REALLY works.

Let me give you another example of how to use controversy to create a presell report. Indeed, you may have even seen this strategy used countless times. The idea is to proclaim that a strategy, product or other generally accepted idea is “dead” (i.e., it no longer works).

Tip: This strategy is a bit over-used in certain online marketing niches. However, it works well outside of these circles, such as in a gardening niche, dog training niche or even the golf niche.

Let me give you an example from the golf market.

Example: One of the most widely used ways to grip a golf club is referred to as the Vardon Grip (named after the golfer who invented the grip, a fellow by the name of Harry Vardon). You’ll see this grip used everywhere, from games at your local golf country club to pros using it on the PGA Tour. Indeed, most every golfer has at least tried the Vardon Grip, and many people continue to use it.

So imagine the impact creating a report called “The Vardon Grip is Dead” or “Why You Need to Stop Using the Vardon Grip TODAY” (or anything else controversial and along those lines) would have.

Would it make people in your target market take notice? You bet. Would they read the report? Of course. And if your report is a bit on the controversial side, you can bet these prospects are also going to talk about your report on niche forums, blogs, social media sites and even on the golf green.

In this example, you might spend $\frac{1}{4}$ up to $\frac{1}{2}$ of the report talking about why the Vardon Grip doesn't work. Then you can spend the remainder of the report telling your readers about an alternative. You can then point your prospects towards a paid book that gives them even more secrets for shaving strokes off their game.

This is a great approach if you execute it properly.

So what's the key to proper execution? You just need to make sure that you're offering compelling evidence for whatever controversial stand, opinion or theory you're putting forth. And you need to make sure your alternative really works. Indeed, you should provide actionable tips that your readers can use immediately to see some results.

Go back to the "Vardon Grip" example. If you can't offer any reason why the Vardon Grip is an inferior grip, then your report really isn't very controversial. It will end up looking like a sad, desperate attempt to trash a good grip as a means of making money by selling your product.

That's why you need to provide compelling evidence. You need to back up your case, perhaps with case studies and other proof. You need to lay out your case as carefully as a flamboyant lawyer who's gunning for partner in a big law firm.

Get the idea?

You need to be bold and confident, yes. But you can't just make claims without backing them up. If you're going to sway prospects to your way of thinking, you need to be dang sure that your alternative theory or product really is superior to the one that you're proclaiming to be "dying."

Here are a few more examples from different niches...

Example #1: Why Email Marketing is Dead – and What Your Business Needs to Do Instead to Survive!

Example #2: WARNING: Traditional Dog Training Strategies Could Be Destroying Your Dog's Relationship With You!

Example #3: Dirty Little Secrets Your Car Dealer Doesn't Want You to Know

Now, just a moment ago I told you that you should prove your case, perhaps by offering a case study. You can indeed embed a case study inside a controversial report. But even if you don't want to create a controversial presell report, you can still offer a case study.

Which brings us to our final presell report strategy...

Approach 5: Share a Case Study

You'll recall at the beginning of this report that I mentioned how people who're reading sales letters tend to get their "advertising defences" up. This causes them to read all sales letters in a very guarded way. At times they'll be sceptical about your letter. At other times, they'll be outright cynical about your claims.

This is why most sales letters offer proof, such as testimonials, screen shots and videos. This allows the product creator to make a bold claim, and then back up this claim with hard-core evidence. This is a good idea, because most prospects are a little sceptical.

However, you don't need to wait until your prospects get to your sales page before you start offering proof. Instead, use your presell report to share a case study.

Tip: If you're an affiliate for a product that doesn't belong to you, then you can be the subject of the case study. Otherwise, if you're promoting your own product in your presell report, then you need to find someone else to serve as the subject of your case study.

You can use a case study to sell information products, physical products or services.

Example #1: If you're selling a weight loss program, you can share one or more case studies to prove that the program works.

Example #2: If you sell copywriting services, you can share one or more case studies which demonstrate how your services have helped a business owner grow his business.

Example #3: If you're selling an interior car upholstery kit for a classic car, you can share a case study that demonstrates how easy it was for a beginner to install it (and how great it looks once the interior is finished).

As you might suspect, there are two benefits to sharing a case study:

- 1. Allows you to provide proof to your prospects. Remember, people are sceptical. A case study is a powerful form of proof, because you're not just saying, "this product works." Instead, you're actually showing how well it works over time by sharing a detailed account of how it works, along with pictures, videos and other evidence. In other words, it's a very compelling way to overcome a sceptical prospect's objections.
- 2. Gives you a chance to share useful yet incomplete information. As you reveal the case study, you can share with your readers tips and steps that will help your prospects get these same results. For example, if you're selling a dieting program, then you can offer nutrition and exercise tips alongside your case-study evidence.

Now, you'll see that I keep referring to a case study as "proof" and "evidence." This is important. You see, you can't just share the end results, otherwise your case study will read more like a testimonial. Instead, you need to share the results in a step-by-step manner, as they unfolded over time.

Example: Let's go back to the weight loss example. Here you can offer a six to twelve week case study. Let's say you cover six weeks. Your presell report would then summarize the subject's results each week, like this:

Starting point: You'd share your subject's "before" photos, along with their weight and measurements. Give an overview of what they did for six weeks.

Week 1: Describe subject's diet and exercise routine this week. Show pictures and measurements from the end of the week.

Week 2: Talk about any changes the subject implemented this week, such as cutting out sugar. Show pics and numbers recorded at the end of the week.

Week 3: Talk about what exercise changes the subject implemented, such as adding five or ten minutes to his cardio routine. Show measurements and pics taken at the end of the week.

Week 4: Share what a typical day's menu looks like for the subject. Show pics and measurements at the end of the week.

Week 5: What a typical day at the gym (lifting weights) is like for the subject. Show pics and measurements.

Week 6: Show final pics and measurements. For an even greater impact, display the "before" pics and measurements alongside these new "after" pics and measurements. Then describe how much better the subject feels and how his weight loss and new lifestyle is positively impacting his life.

The goal here at the end of the report is to inspire and motivate the reader. You want them to get excited about the case study. You want them to start imagining what it will be like for them to get these same results. Yes, you're tapping some emotional buttons here, by showing them how he can get rid of his pains and start leading a better life. But by pushing these buttons, you're also putting your prospect into a buying mood.

See how that works?

You show your subject's progress over time, using compelling proof like photos. But you also provide tips and examples (like sample menus and exercise routines) so that your reader can start getting some of the same benefits. Then you create a call to action at the end of the report, where you tell your reader to buy this proven product.

Quick Recap

At this point you've learned about five different ways to create your presell report. But maybe you're wondering how to actually sell something within this report.

That is, how do you create a soft sell? How do you create a strong call to action?

That's what you'll discover next, so read on...

Create a Call to Action

As mentioned at the beginning of this guide, your presell report has a singular purpose. And that singular purpose is to "warm up" your prospects so they'll click on your sales page link and buy the product. This means that you need to walk a fine line between providing great content (which builds trust) and promoting your offer.

You see, if you just jump right in and promote your offer, those "advertising defence shields" are going to go up. Your prospects are going to shut down. They might even click away from your report, especially if they don't yet have any reason to trust you.

So you offer good content. Build rapport. Build trust. Demonstrate value. Show that you know what you're talking about. And then you provide a strong call to action.

Here's how it works:

- You can mention the product you're promoting in the beginning and middle of the report. At these times, however, you're doing more of a soft sell. You're planting a seed, but you're not being aggressive.
- You provide a call to action at the end of the report. This is where you specifically and explicitly tell people what you want them to do next. Namely, you want them to click on a link and buy a product.

Let's look at these two types of promotions separately...

Soft-Selling in the Beginning and Middle of Report

As mentioned above, you can use the beginning and middle of your report to plant a seed. By this, I mean that you want to start hinting about what the product or service you're promoting can do for your prospect. You can arouse curiosity. You can let your readers know that later on you'll tell them how to solve their problems.

Yes, you'll outright mention the product. You'll link to it. You can even tell your readers it's a good solution and that they should buy it. But as you'll see, all of this falls under the category of soft-selling. That's because you're not being aggressive – not yet. Because you don't want those defence shields to come up.

Now maybe you're wondering how you can start mentioning the product and planting seeds.

So let me give you 10 examples of soft-selling and/or seed-planting. See if you can't take these examples and apply them to your own presell report.

For the sake of example today, imagine that you want to promote a website called DigiWorkSheets.com (yes, this is a real site), which shows people how to attract and convert free traffic when selling digital products and online courses. Here are some examples of how you'd soft-sell the site in the beginning and middle of the report:

The following is an excerpt from a DigiWorkSheets.com exercise...

A bit later in this report I'll tell you about a resource that shows you exactly how to get all the FREE traffic you need to launch your course.

I've talked to lots of people who struggled to get traffic. They wasted hundreds or even thousands of dollars on traffic sources that didn't convert. They're often surprised when I tell them that they can get all the targeted traffic they need for free. They usually don't believe me until they've been to www.DigiWorksheets.com.

That's just an overview of how to use viral marketing to get traffic. To learn more about it and to discover even more free ways of getting targeted visitors to your site, check out www.DigiWorksheets.com.

Let me tell you about my favourite method for getting free traffic. This is the exact method we used to launch the DigiWorksheets.com site, so you know it works.

Take a look at these fantastic traffic logs from DigiWorksheets.com.

Later on in this training you'll discover the best traffic source available which you'll undoubtedly want to include in your marketing arsenal.

What you're about to discover works in any niche and are the same strategies you'll find available inside the DigiWorksheets training.

I spent 10 years and a great deal of money learning these strategies the hard way – through trial and error! The good news is that you can skip that long and expensive learning curve via DigiWorksheets.com.

In just moments you'll find out how to get a flood of traffic using my two favourite strategies. And later on, when you're ready, I suggest you take a look at www.DigiWorksheets.com, which is where you'll learn everything I know about getting and converting free traffic.

Here's a final tip that I only reveal to DigiWorksheets.com visitors...

See how that works?

You just drop your promotions into the content in quite a subtle way. No pressure on your reader. And yet you're going to make readers curious.

That's good. Because by the time they reach the end of your report, they are already impressed with you. They know you can solve their problems. And therefore they're open to your suggestions about how to get their problems solved.

Which brings us to your call to action...

Providing a Strong Call to Action at the End of the Report

You've constructed your presell report in such a way that your prospects are “warmed up” to the idea of your product or service. In many cases, that’s because you’ve provided them with useful yet incomplete content, so by now they realize they need your product in order to completely solve their problems.

Now, you’d think you could just drop a link in your final paragraph and your readers will know what to do. But you’ll get a better conversion rate if you tell your readers EXACTLY what you want them to do. And better yet, you need to give them a good reason to do what you’re asking them to do (which is to click on your sales link and check out a product or service).

So let me give you an example of a call to action:

You just discovered three proven ways to pull in targeted traffic. And while these three traffic strategies are a good start, that’s all they are – a start. Because savvy business owners know that the key to success is in getting as much targeted traffic to your site as possible and knowing how to convert it.

Many business owners go bankrupt trying to get the traffic they need. But you don’t have to. And now you don’t need to spend months or years trying to learn how to attract and convert traffic through trial error.

Because when you click here now to visit the DigiWorksheets.com site, you’ll quickly discover how you too can get all the highly-responsive, FREE traffic you need.

Yes, you can start being a rainmaker in your niche. It’s entirely possible.

But none of that will happen if you don’t know how to drive traffic. So visit DigiWorksheets.com right now – and get set to watch your traffic, sales and cash flow increase!

See how that works? There are actually two calls to action in this example, as I told the prospects twice to click on a link to visit the DigiWorksheets.com site. You’ll also notice that I gave them good reasons to visit. Specifically:

1. They’ll discover how to get free, responsive, targeted traffic.
2. This free traffic will increase their sales and cash flow.
3. This will help lead on to them growing into a very successful business.

Now think about the main benefits of your product. Then use the above example to create your own powerful call to action.

Conclusion

Congratulations are in order for you. That's because you now know how to harness one of the most powerful pre-sales tools available to you: the presell report.

Let's quickly recap what you learned about creating this conversion-boosting tool...

- You learned about how your approach needs to differ, depending on whether you're selling services, physical products or information products.
- You learned about five different approaches you can use to impress your prospects and warm them up to the idea of buying your product or service.
- You found out how to create a call to action that gets your prospects clicking through to your sales page.
- You've got the blueprint. You know how to do it.

So now there's just one thing left for you to do: take action!

If you already have a product you're selling – either your own or an affiliate offer – then it's time for you to start outlining your presell report.

Begin right now by choosing the approach that works best for what you're selling.

Then just start writing!

Has this this short report proven helpful?

Hopefully, it's provided you with a solid introduction as to how you might start to presell your own signature product or service in order to help accelerate your business growth, if that's one of your primary, long-term objectives. And I'm sure that you also realise that there's a great deal more you'll need to do in order to get your business to the level that you truly want.

About The Author:

Do you ever wish there was an easier way to attract clients?

If you're thinking "Yes, I do!" you're certainly not alone. Many professional service providers feel exactly the same way as you because their expertise is in providing the service that they're qualified to provide, rather than in the selling of it.

And just imagine for a second how much easier it would be, how much happier you'd feel and how much more you could be earning if suddenly you discovered the secret to having a crowd of clients wanting to engage you, rather than you having to go out searching for them.

If our paths haven't crossed before, let me introduce myself. I'm Tim Dodd, a former chartered accountant and specialist business workflow consultant. In simple terms, I help clients put in place processes that attract potential new business automatically.

If you're an entrepreneurial business owner or professional service provider, who would like to automate their lead generation, prospect follow-up and business relationship building processes in order to spend more chargeable time working with your best clients, doing what you enjoy doing most, then I'm certain that I can help you to achieve that goal.

If you like the idea but aren't convinced I'd be able to help your particular business, make an appointment to speak with me today and find out why I'm so confident that I can.

Just head over to www.3dconsultingservices.com/call and select the appointment time that's most convenient for you.

There's no charge, and when we talk I promise to provide you with at least one strategy you could implement immediately which would transform how you won new clients in the future!

And, whether you decide to get in touch or not, may your God always be with you and continue to guide you along the path you've chosen and were created to pursue in order to prosper and live a uniquely fulfilling life.

I truly look forward to speaking with you.

Tim
